

James Ing    Mary Ann Shrimpton

A birth which seems to match that of Rosina Ing is the following:

Rosa Ing, Jul-Sept 1846, Thame district, vol 16, page 105. There is, of course, the difference between Rosa and Rosina but weighed against her age, her father's Christian name and occupation it looks correct. Getting the certificate would confirm this.

Two other pieces of information about this family are census entries:

1861 census Long Crendon, Buckinghamshire Dist 7 page 35 sch. 185

Mary Ing, 25, Mason, Y

Fanny Ing, 3, Mason, Y

Phillip Ing, 3M, Mason, Y

(The first three are bracketed as lace makers and the last four are all bracketed as masons!)

By 1871 census Three of the Ings are recorded in the 1881 census at 28 Hackford Road, Lambeth.

James Ing, head, married, 56, Bricklayer, Buckingham Crendon

Mary A Ing, wife, married, 54, Buckingham Crendon

Lizzy Ing, daug, unmarried, Lace Joiner Buckingham Crendon.

This move to Lambeth probably explains how Rosina came to meet and marry John William Smith.

Description of Long Crendon from J. J. Sheahan, 1861.

The parish of Crendon of Long Crendon, is separated by the river Thame from Aylesbury Hundred on the west, and Oxfordshire on the south. Its area, according to the Parliamentary Return is 3,120 acres. Lipscomb states that "Crendon township contains about 3,063 acres, Notley about 725 acres, and a detached portion of the parish called Tittershall Wood 110 acres; in all 3,448 acres." The present number of the population is 1,570; and is 3,448 acres." The place is supposed to have derived its name from a Green hill on which it is situated; and its prefix as a distinction Grendon Underwood. The soil is chiefly a stiff pale clay.

The village, which is about a mile in length, is situated 2 miles N. by W. from Thame, and nine miles S.W. from Aylesbury. About one hundred persons are employed here in the manufacture of needles, and lace making is also carried on here to a considerable extent.

Some sites which throw light on lace making in the area: (each will open a new window.)
